As globalisation progresses and migration increases, the number of families who are bi-national and bi-cultural is growing. This brings a new set of challenges and opportunities for family mediators. It also brings new opportunities and challenges for international family mediation. In this area, mediators play an increasingly important role.

The work of the network suggests that it is possible to work in these cases, and that mediator training programmes can provide the necessary skills. The network of international family mediators, which was set up in 2005, aims to address the specific needs of mediators working in the area of international family mediation. It is a network of mediators who work in different countries and who are trained to work in different cultural contexts.

The network has been established in response to the growing need for mediators who are trained to work in the area of international family mediation. The network provides a forum for mediators to share their experiences and to learn from each other. It also provides a platform for mediators to develop their skills and to improve their practice.

The network is open to mediators from all over the world, and it is open to mediators who work in different languages. The network provides a platform for mediators to share their experiences and to learn from each other. It also provides a platform for mediators to develop their skills and to improve their practice.

The network is a valuable resource for mediators who work in the area of international family mediation. It provides a forum for mediators to share their experiences and to learn from each other. It also provides a platform for mediators to develop their skills and to improve their practice.

The network is a valuable resource for mediators who work in the area of international family mediation. It provides a forum for mediators to share their experiences and to learn from each other. It also provides a platform for mediators to develop their skills and to improve their practice.

The network is a valuable resource for mediators who work in the area of international family mediation. It provides a forum for mediators to share their experiences and to learn from each other. It also provides a platform for mediators to develop their skills and to improve their practice.