As globalization progresses and migration increases, the number of international and intercultural relationships and marriages is increasing. This brings new issues and diversity to our society, but also brings new challenges and difficulties when those relationships break down. One of the difficulties that often arises in international family mediation, where one or both parties are from a different country, is the lack of familiarity with the legal systems of the other country. This can make it challenging for both parties and can lead to conflict and misunderstanding.

Mediation, however, offers a number of specific advantages compared to the court process, particularly where there are children involved. In court, it is often mandatory to use a specific language and follow a specific procedure, which can be difficult for those who do not speak the language well or are not familiar with the process. In mediation, the process is much more flexible and can be adapted to the needs of the parties involved. This can be particularly important in cases where children are involved, as it allows for a more child-centered approach.

Another advantage is that mediation can be quicker and cheaper than court proceedings. This is particularly important in cases where there are children involved, as it can help to minimize the impact of the conflict on the children. In court, the process can be long and drawn out, and there may be a lot of legal fees involved. In mediation, the process is much more direct and can be completed much faster.

Finally, mediation can be more satisfying for the parties involved, as it allows them to have a say in the outcome of the case and to work towards a resolution that is acceptable to all. In court, the judge makes the final decision, and there may be a lot of conflict and disagreement over the outcome. In mediation, the parties work together to find a solution that works for everyone involved.

In summary, mediation offers a number of specific advantages compared to the court process, particularly where there are children involved. It is quicker, cheaper, and more satisfying for the parties involved. It is an important tool in resolving family disputes, and it should be used whenever possible.