The idea that if we want to influence the law as much as the law influences mediation? A big question for the longer term is this: might mediation come to demonstrate that, like it or not, mediation involves a complex set of judgements about things that have to do with justice. Whether some outcomes only fulfil one of the three poles I leave for now. My real purpose in this blog post is to argue that mediation is, in fact, a process of making legal decisions. Whether or not we like it, mediation is part of the legal system. Whether or not we like it, mediation is, to a large extent, about law. Whether or not we like it, mediation is a law-fairness relationship. Whether or not we like it, mediation is a law-fairness relationship. Whether or not we like it, mediation is a law-fairness relationship.
