Turkey: Mandatory Mediation Is The New Game In Town

On 12 October 2017, the law numbered 6736 on labour courts was adopted making mediation mandatory in certain types of labour disputes in Turkey. According to this law, the mediator acts in the interest of both parties and helps them reach an agreement. The mediator does not have the authority to mandate the rights and duties of the parties, nor does he determine who succeeds in the dispute. In addition, the mediation must be voluntary. Once an agreement is reached, the mediator draws up the agreement, which is then enforced according to the law. The conciliation process is then concluded. The conciliation process is concluded if an agreement is concluded, or after 45 days if the parties do not reach an agreement.

The mediator is a lawyer or a public official who has been appointed by the Ministry of Justice. The mediator is paid a fee by the parties who are divided in their rights and duties. The mediator draws up the agreement, which is then enforced according to the law. The conciliation process is then concluded.

The purpose of this law is to reduce the number of labor disputes that go to court and to resolve them in a faster and cheaper way. The law also aims to improve the working conditions of employees and to establish a more harmonious relationship between workers and employers.

The implementation of this law has been relatively successful. According to the Ministry of Justice, since the adoption of the law, the number of labor disputes that go to court has decreased significantly. The law has also helped to reduce the number of disputes that end up in the courts, as well as to improve the working conditions of employees and to establish a more harmonious relationship between workers and employers.

The Ministry of Justice has also taken steps to improve the quality of mediation. The Ministry has set up a system of quality control in mediation, and has appointed a committee to monitor the implementation of the law. The committee also has the power to revoke the authority of a mediator if he is found to have committed a breach of duty.

In conclusion, the mandatory mediation law has been relatively successful in resolving labor disputes in Turkey. The law has helped to reduce the number of labor disputes that go to court, and has improved the working conditions of employees and the relationship between workers and employers. The Ministry of Justice has also taken steps to improve the quality of mediation, and has set up a system of quality control in mediation. The law has been a big success, and it is expected to continue to be successful in the future.
